etween land distant from town and pu lic utilities and acres at the threshold of the metropolis of Nebraska, with its excel-lent educational advantages and splendid live stock, grain and produce market. Why is it these talks on appeal to so many people, far and wide, who write for our literature? Because of an universal interest in suburban acreage. People cannot help but think on this subject of the betterment of their lot. They realize they are growing older. They know the income from a house and lot will not provide for old age, while a few acres will. The "next year" people never seriously consider any proposition. The progressive element in a community selze every opportunity for advancement. Every person gets in his own class.

The Call of the Country
